

Description

Field of the invention

This invention relates to the displaying of advertising indicia on golf courses and golf centers.

Background of the Invention

Golf courses and Golf centers have areas that golfers use to warm-up and to practice their golf swings. Golfers hit golf balls on these areas before they play and when they want to practice their swing; they are supplied with golf balls, which they in turn hit into a large open area. Often it is desirable for the golf course or golf center to have predetermined sections and ball trays already out for the golfers to use and to keep them separated from one another. Typically the golf centers and courses use lengths of rope to divide the area where they want the golfers to stand and they use plastic ball trays to keep the golf balls in one area. Golf centers also provide golf mats and plastic ball trays for golfers to hit off of to save the grass and make a better surface to practice from.

Summary of the Invention

The invention makes it easier for golf courses and golf centers to achieve the tasks mentioned above while providing a means to advertise to all of the golfers who come to their establishment. The invention allows for the golf courses and golf centers to separate the golfers and provide them a place to hold their golf balls. The units are placed on the ground and are about (5) feet in length. Since the units are plastic and easily moved they can be used on any surface to separate the golfers and hold golf balls while allowing signs/plaques to be placed on the unit that are always in plain view of the golfer while he/she is hitting golf balls.
